"Welcome the unknown.

I think this unknown is all we can know. It is our search for meaning, our attempt at planning and order, and our longing for prediction that curses us. It ruins all that comes next. As humans, we try to set our sights on distant goals, and then promptly languish when something we didn't expect happens. But shouldn't we have known to expect that? When do things ever go as planned? How often are we thrown off our path only to discover another? Only then does more of the picture reveal itself and we can see the faults of the past. Don't you often look back on something and laugh at your angst? Don't you see the absurdity of your reactions in retrospect? Don't you wish you had been calmer, more understanding, more compassionate, more rational in the moment? Had you seen the inconsequentiality of it, you would have been able to be those things and more."

In these three philosophical essays, DeRoche examines the nature of life, meaning, and existence in his signature smart, sarcastic yet thoughtful style.
